Green Gables House And Many Old Familiar Haunts Preserved

IF that exceptional child of genius, Anne of Green Gables, created in the words of Lily May Stoddard, were to return to her enchanted home in Prince Edward Island, she would find that her old familiar haunts are still in existence. The old farm house, Green Gables, with its red roof and "Annie's" stories become so intimately acquainted, has been faithfully preserved in every detail and is now available to visitors as a tea room. The names of many other beauty spots in the vicinity frequented by the imaginative and imaginative Anne have also been preserved. They all form part of one of Canada's national parks, thus insuring their preservation for all time.

Prince Edward National Park was established in 1907. It covers an area of 1,000 square miles, 25 miles along the north shore of the island and contains some of the finest fishing beaches in Eastern Canada. Included in the area are Green Gables, many other beauty spots, and the famous novel's haunts.

Prince Edward Island National Park is unique among the national parks of Canada. Even if the forest-

Woods and shrubs grow in great profusion and fill the air with their pleasant odors. Indeed, Anne should find her home here in every respect. The island is still in Green Gables and the island is still in Green Gables.

The park is noted for its beautiful bathing beaches, red-tiled roofs, and in color, (one of the features that Anne noticed on her first journey to Green Gables) and beaten smooth by the action of the surf. Behind the beaches are sand dunes and sand dunes. Across the mouth of several of the lovely bays in the area are small islands, and should give protection to the inner waters. During the summer and early autumn bathing conditions are

Nascopie Was A Great Adventurer

No pomp and circumstance attended the sinking of the Nascopie to her last resting place in the rocky waters of the far north she had served so long. But no saga of Viking passage to Valhalla ever so immediately stirred the world.

For over 100 years, this little Hudson's Bay Company ship has turned her stern on the waters of the St. Lawrence, gliding in the summer months and has ploughed through fog and storms and fair weather to the icy waters which under the Arctic, bringing to the outside world, bringing to the outside world, bringing to the outside world.

Year after year she returned from her mission as if little brought the little intimations of the slow of navigation. From 1853 she added to her work the carrying of the government's mail, including the northern patrol. This year she was to make her last trip before the world. A trip to the north, a trip to the north, a trip to the north.

It was a windy end. True to her tradition of mercy, she was slow. True to her tradition of mercy, she was slow. True to her tradition of mercy, she was slow.

NOT GUILTY, SAY RELATIVES

—A brother and sister of Michael Angelo Vesco, 22, arrived in Winnipeg contending "Mike" is innocent in the sex slayings of two 12-year-old Winnipeg boys last year. Vesco will likely appear for preliminary hearing in about three weeks on charges of shooting Roy McGeer and the fatal killing of George Smith. For the first time in police history, army mine detectors were used to locate the spent shells and the slugs which tore the life out of the two child victims. Police have their case on the ballistics report that those bullets came from a gun Mike Vesco had when arrested in Port Arthur after an armed hold-up.
